Why India wants to fence its border with Myanmar

Amid Myanmar's persistent civil unrest, neighbouring India has been drawn into the fray, with New Delhi expressing growing apprehension over the escalating situation. This concern culminated in the release of a significant advisory, marking the first of its kind since violence erupted in the region. The advisory, issued by the Indian government, strongly in the region.

The advisory, issued by the Indian government, strongly urges individuals to evacuate Rakhine State immediately and advises against any travel plans to the area, emphasizing the gravity of the situation. Rakhine State, situated along Myanmar's western coast, has been a focal point of conflict, although it does not share a direct border with India.

The roots of this conflict trace back to the displacement of Rohingya Muslims by the Myanmar military, which has now found itself in a reversal of roles as it faces opposition from groups like the Arakan Army, a key player in the three Brotherhood Alliance. The Arakan Army has made significant territorial gains, capturing outposts, cities and even military, installations, seading to a state of unpest even military installations, leading to a state of unrest hat has prompted India's intervention. with Myanmar, coupled with a patrol track to monitor activity effectively. This proposed measure is in Manipur, situated on in Manipur, situated on the border. However, the proposal is not without controversy, as it faces opposition from regional leaders like those in Nagaland and Mizoram. citing those in Nagaland and Mizoram, citing concerns over disrupting local sentiments and familial ties across the border. Despite the contentious nature of the proposal, the Indian government seems determined to proceed, viewing it as a means to mitigate its contents but also a broade perspective on the regional implications of the conflict. As violence spreads beyond Rakhine State to other regions like Shan, Chin, Karenni and Sagaing, the international community, including Western nations, is increasingly calling for an end to the bioodshed. "We strongly condenn the ngoing violence harming civilians, including the military's continued use of indiscriminate airstrikes.
